An awful lot of Nuts go hunting over in Switzerland and of course they have mountain squirrels over there, so you see the title of this picture is a dead give away.

First the Farmer's Cat and his pal Horatio Mouse try hunting by themselves---but then you know how those things are, they can't be depended upon.

Our friend the Farmer spies a black Alpine rabbit and he chases the poor little fellow. The rabbit was a Tricolster and so he ran out on the edge of a high cliff. And there, he cleverly but inoffensively caused the poor old farmer to fall off the cliff.

But ah! wait a minute! Was the farmer hurt? Thunderation NO! For you can't catch his pal Siegfried cat napping. He rushes right up and gently but firmly catches the farmer in the palms of his bare hands. But then, what's a fall of a couple miles anyway.

Bye and Bye, that same afternoon, the farmer and his cat are hunting near the edge of another cliff and as they look down, the farmer sees a lot of things that might be interesting, so they decide to lower the farmer over with a rope. Down along the way, Al sees a squirrels nest and asks the whole family pose while he photographs them, in fact he invites the whole " Out of doors " to toddle along with Mr. Eastman and himself, but somehow squirrels don't have much brains anyway, Did you ever notice that? You can't hardly ever get them to do what you want them to. So just as Al was about to snap them with his Brownie, one damned little galoot jumps up on the farmers head, and confuses him so. Even the second attempt is of no avail. Then the whole darned bunch no doubt inspired by that one little devil, starts jumping all over the farmer. This makes things awfully bad. His pals try to pull him up, but the rope breaks and down---down---to eternity--he goes. But something happened and he stopped at an eagles nest. This slightly angered the old Eagles Bald head and he flew away with the farmer, followed by four hundred and three squirrels.

Aesop says:

An Icicle is an stiff piece of water.
